Location

The Parioli district is the second district of Rome whose name derives from the name of "Monti Parioli", given to a group of tuff hills before the urbanization of the area, which took place in the early twentieth century. Some say that the name derives from peraioli, for the cultivations of pear trees that were there. Large avenues, such as viale Parioli, extended to viale Liegi, avenues Tiziano and Pilsudsky conceived as a "city walk" with a side track-canter in the shade of the trees and next to elegant villas for the rising bourgeoisie. With the advent of the fascist regime, the Parioli became an "aristocratic zone", destined for the hierarchs of the regime, even though they had already hosted many nobles and exponents of the bureaucracy that arrived in Rome with the Savoy. The neighborhood was completed during the 1950s.

Services

For the 1960 Olympics, held in Rome, the area between the slopes of Villa Glori, Via Flaminia and Viale

Pilsudsky was chosen to build a series of important sports and service facilities. The residential hill thus quickly becomes a service and transit area. The neighborhood is home to embassies and consulates, foreign banks and finance companies and a myriad of studies and offices. The presence of professionals and tertiary activities have determined the rapid multiplication of bars, restaurants and shops.
